Join us for a collaborative workshop exploring public opinion and demographic trends on immigration in the United States and Canada. This session will bring together researchers from the Metropolis Institute and Pew Research Center to analyze recent data on evolving trends on immigration in the two countries. Participants will gain insights into evolving trends shaping public opinion on immigration and discuss the implications for policy and public engagement. Through presentations, interactive discussions, and data-driven activities, we aim to foster a deeper understanding of the cross-border dynamics shaping North American public opinion on immigration.

Changing the Narrative in Canada and the US: A Conversation Around Advocacy and Impact in the Immigration Space

For the first time in a quarter century, a clear majority of Canadians now say there is too much immigration. Public support for immigration has been grounded in large part in the belief that it contributes to Canada's economy. The Canadian government has created a powerful narrative that highly skilled, economically self-sufficient immigrants are the ideal candidates for Canadian citizenship. Sadly, refugees, and especially refugees from the Horn of Africa, do not fit that narrative. My presentation will summarize my ongoing research on the education and career aspirations of youth with refugee backgrounds from Eritrea, Ethiopia, Somalia, Sudan, and South Sudan. Instead of putting the structures in place that value the youths' assets and strengths, my findings consistently suggest that unexamined deficit thinking around race and refugees is used to sustain and produce new forms of everyday precarity for these youth. However, the youth are not passive bystanders. They are demonstrating they are capable and able to contribute meaningfully to their communities. Whether consciously or unconsciously, effectively or not, the youth are continuously pushing back on the common narrative that African refugees are needy and lack skills. They have adopted the counter narrative of capability, agency, and resistance.

How to build migration partnerships engaging employers: two case studies from the hospitality sector

The world is going through unprecedented demographic shifts, which are expected to result in a shortfall of 15 million workers per year across the high-income countries. Labor mobility has proven to be one of the most effective tools to address worker shortages. However, for any labor mobility pathway to be successful, it is crucial for employers to take a major role in its establishment. And yet, employers have not always been part of designing and implementing such programs.

In this workshop, participants will learn about the importance of inclusion of the private sector in labor mobility partnerships and approaches towards successful engagement with businesses. It will feature new initiatives built on industry-led partnership focus.

Canada's Immigration at a Crossroads: Policy Shifts and Emerging Trends

Join leading academic and policy experts to discuss Canada's shifting immigration dynamics and policies in the face of changing public opinion, rising politicization of temporary migrants, and variations in subnational policies. With elections looming, this session offers a timely, multilevel analysis of recent labor migration policy changes and emerging trends such as new immigration levels, automation and competing policy frameworks. Organized by ÉRIQA (Équipe de recherche au Québec et ailleurs – www.eriqa.org), an interuniversity research team, this roundtable offers a critical dialogue that bridges global challenges with the unique realities of Canada's immigration landscape.

Bridging Borders: Labour Mobility, Policy Shifts, and the Future of Immigration in North America

In recent years, immigration has become an increasingly complex and polarizing issue across North America. Both Canada and the United States have experienced a reduction in immigration numbers and faced growing anti-immigrant sentiment. Meanwhile, labour mobility has emerged as a critical issue, as economies on both sides of the border confront skills shortages and shifting demographics. This panel will bring together thought leaders and policy experts from Canada and the United States to examine these trends, assess their implications for the labor market, and discuss policy responses and practical solutions to foster inclusive and sustainable labour mobility.

This session will be co-led by Skills for Change, a Canadian organization known for its work in newcomer integration and workforce development, and the National Immigration Forum, a prominent U.S. organization advocating for the value of immigrants. This transnational dialogue will highlight both shared and divergent experiences and explore how policy and public opinion are shaping the future of immigration and labor markets across North America.

- Surranna Sandy, CEO, Skills for Change, Expert in workforce development, focused on immigrant integration and skill-building for economic inclusion.
- Emily Foster, Vice President & Chief of Public Affairs, National Immigration forum, Immigration policy expert with insights into U.S. immigration reform, workforce participation, community outreach, and coalition building.
- Laura Reiff, Business Immigration Lawyer at Greenberg Traurig.

Operation Ukrainian Safe Haven

The session will focus on Canada's humanitarian response frameworks, focusing on the formal and informal partnerships between the federal government and the settlement sector. The session will highlight the benefits of this integrated response system, the information pathways present within the collaborative tables, and how this system supported the successful settlement of more than 200,000 displaced Ukrainians and 50,000 Afghan refugees. The session will also focus on lessons learned from Canada's Operation Ukrainian Safe Haven (OUSH), Afghan Special Initiative (AFI), and Operation Syrian Refugee (OSR), and provide recommendations that will guide Canada's future Humanitarian Response Framework and can be implemented locally.

Looking beyond the national: Regional leadership as a source of innovation

Conversations around immigration policies generally focus on the national level, and yet there are vast differences in immigration patterns, needs, and politics across regions in the US and Canada. This creates challenges – as some regions seek to attract migrants at the same time others are overwhelmed with inflows – but also opportunities for collaboration and progress at the local level even while divisive politics stalls progress at the national level. This session will explore how to build infrastructure connecting immigrants to where they are most needed and have the highest chances of success, and how to build federal level policies that are better connected to regional needs.

The role of media in debates around immigration

How is the media thinking about immigration as a policy and political issue -- past, present and as we look to the future? What is the dynamic behind the scenes from the perspective of producing immigration-related content, and what does that mean about language, narrative and impact. We'll also discuss how the media landscape is changing rapidly and what to expect in the months ahead - in mainstream press, alternative reporting, and immigrant-focused media.

The Impact of the US Elections on Immigration in North America

On November 5th, Americans elected Donald Trump in a campaign where the President-elect insisted that immigration would be a day one priority for his administration. Reshaping US immigration policy will not come without challenges and will undoubtedly have important domestic ramifications and global ramifications. There will be different pressures on Mexico and Canada as they adjust and respond to the actions adopted by the US administration on immigration. What will the changes imply for cooperation between the three countries with respect to policies and practices? What might it all imply for the borders of the three countries? How best can civil society work together to collectively respond to the proposed changes. This plenary session will hear from experts from the United States and Mexico and invite observations from the Forum participants.

Regional Migration Governance in the Americas: Challenges and Opportunities

As the Americas are witnessing substantial mobility, the institutional landscape of migration governance is complex with a rich history of sub-regional cooperation. This paved the way for the adoption of the Los Angeles Declaration on Migration and Protection on the margins of the 9th Summit of the Americas in 2022. This initiative holds great potential, but there are still challenges regarding sufficient coordination and complementarity and integrating the established collaborations into the framework of the Declaration. This roundtable aims to review challenges and opportunities as this new mechanism emerges towards enhanced cooperation and synergy to improve migration in the Western Hemisphere.
